"That can't be true," the emperor said.

"It is true," the man said. "Stupid people cannot see our clothes. Only clever people can see our clothes. Clever people can see how beautiful they are."

"I want to be able to tell who the stupid and clever people are in my empire," the emperor thought. He told the two men, "Make me some of your clothes. I will give you a lot of money."

"May we have the money now?" one of the men asked. "We must buy silk and a loom."

"Very well," he said. "Here is some money."

The two men were away.

The next day, the emperor said to his prime minister,

"Two men are making me some magic clothes. Stupid people could not see them. Go look at the clothes. Then, come and tell me about the clothes. Tell me what they look like."

The prime minister went to see the two men. The men were sitting at an invisible loom, making invisible clothes with invisible silk.

The prime minister could not see any clothes. He could not see anything on the loom.

"What are you doing?" he asked.

"We are making magic clothes with magic silk," the two men said. "Clever people can see this. Stupid people cannot."

Level 1 The Emperor's New Clothes

Is It the Ghost?

Pre-reading Questions

1. What do you think you could do to see a ghost's breath?
2. Why might a ghost choose to live in the Paris Opera?

It was the evening on which the manager of the Opera knew going a final show to mark their retirement. Six young ladies of the ballet entered into the beautiful dressing room of one of the main dancers, La Sorcière, who was practicing her "ballerina" speech. Some of the girls were laughing merrily, while others began to cry with fear. Little Jeanette, a young dancer with beautiful eyes, explained it in a scared voice.

"It's the ghost!" she said, looking the door.

"Have you seen him?" Sorcière asked.

"As clearly as I see you now!" said little Jeanette, as she dropped into a chair.

"Then little Gray, with hair as black as jet, added, "If that's the ghost, let's verify it!"

"Oh, yes!" cried the ballerinas.

They all began to talk together. It seemed that the ghost had appeared as a man in dress clothes and had come through the wall!

For several months, there had been nothing discussed at the Opera but the ghost in dress clothes who walked the building from top to bottom. He spoke to nobody, disappeared as soon as he was seen, and in consequence, all the girls pretended to have not him. Even when he did not show himself, they said he was around. If anyone met with a fall, was the subject of a joke, or had something unfortunate, the ghost was immediately responsible.

Joseph Inoué, a news-seller, was one person who had truly seen the ghost. He had met him on the stairs only for a second but said:

"He is very thin so that it looks as if his coat hangs on a delicate frame, and his eyes are so deep that you can only see two big, black holes, like a dead man's head. His skin is so white but a terrible yellow. His nose is so small that you can see it from the side, and he has only three or four pieces of long, dark hair."

Soon after, there were several interesting events. For example, a lover forever named Poupette, having gone to look at the basement, returned suddenly and almost fell into the arms of the mother of little Jeanette. He said that he had seen the ghost coming toward him, with no body but with just a head of feet!

The balls girl decided that the ghost must have several heads which he could change to as he pleased. But it is decided that they were in the greatest danger. Sorcière herself placed a torch on the table in front of the stage door, which everyone who entered the Opera, other than as a spectator, was told to touch before closing the doors. This torchstone can still be seen as you enter the Opera today.

Now, we return to the evening in question. Jeanette, from the corner of the room, but far full of fear, whispered, "Listen!"

Everybody had a more outside the door, then it stopped. Sorcière decided to be brave in front of the others and went to the door with a knife in her hand.

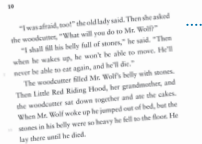

"Is there anyone behind the door?"

Gray held her back by her skirt dramatically crying, "Don't

"I was afraid, too!" she said later. Then she asked the woodcutter, "What will you do to Mr. Wolf?"

"I shall kill his belly full of stones," he said. "Then when he wakes up, he won't be able to move. He'll never be able to get again, and he'll die."

The woodcutter told Mr. Wolf's belly with stones, and then Little Red Riding Hood, her grandmother, and the woodcutter set down together and ate the cakes. When Mr. Wolf woke up he jumped out of bed, but the stones in his belly were so heavy he fell to the floor. He lay there until he died.
